

Episode one of #PasstheMicYouth follows the story of student Sidney Uriarte as she returned to her home country of Nicaragua to visit family. During her visit, the country became enveloped in massive student-led anti-corruption protests which Sidney took part in. Hosts Nyawira, Luke, and Sam discuss Sidney's story, the role of young activists, and social media as a tool for activism.

- In what ways was Sidney an activist?
- In what ways was Sidney's experience different than students living in Nicaragua?
- Do you think it is important for young people to be involved in large national issues such as the pension corruption faced in Nicaragua? Why or why not?
- How and to what extent do you think that activism has changed in the last 50 years?
- What is the role of social media in activism and voicing one's opinion? What are examples?
- To what extent do you believe that young people have an obligation to motivate social change?
